

BERLIN, JUNE

battles of the future will, in all probability, be decided by torpedoes and naval mines.

What the news from the Danube is not yet of a very serious character, the tidings from the east of war in Asia are much more important. Here severe struggles have begun, and the position of the Turks has become very unsatisfactory. The Russian forces entered the Turkish territory in four columns. On the extreme right from Oseurgul on Batoum; next, under command of General Nevski, from Akhalzik to Ardahan; a third column, under Akhmed Ali Pasha, from the Caucasus, under Alexandropol (Gumri), in the direction of Kars; and on the extreme left from Erivan on Bayazid. The main object evidently was to push back the Turks on their frontier fortresses, to isolate these from one another, and to reach the transverse line of road by which the Russian columns could be brought into communication, and eventually co-operate with each other. Considering the small numbers, this was not very difficult; still, it was done systematically. The column on the extreme left had the easiest task, as the 11000 Turks retired from Bayazid to the Aladagh, the south-west; so that, leaving a portion of its forces to guard this and the road to Van, the rest could advance by the great caravan route. On this route, it has been the least heard of at Kirk Killise, near Khamur, where the westerly branch of the Euphrates changes its course southwards.

On the extreme right, the Russians, after not fighting, also seem to have succeeded, not, indeed, in taking Batoum, but in getting to the rear of it, in the line of the Cheruk Su, which opens out communication, though difficult, to Ardahan. In the case of Kars and Ardahan, the junction of the two columns has been successful, and at the fall of the latter place, a portion of the Kars column co-operated with the other. The delay which occurred in attack, though partly owing, perhaps, to the difficulty of bringing the necessary artillery, was likewise requisite to give the Russians time to get a good position. There is no doubt with a view to this that the demonstration was made to the west of Kars, in the direction of the Toghulagh Dagh, which effected its object, causing the precipitate retreat of Mukhtar Pasha, and eight battalions with him, from Kars. Once secured from interruption on that side, the Russian column, which had advanced quite close on Kars, retired again in the direction whence it had come, the object of this movement being to get nearer to Ardahan, the only Turkish position at present in the line of the coast, so as to conceal the departure of the Russians from that place. The Turks only busied themselves to repel the Russian exploring troops, and never troubled their minds with what was going on beyond the fortress. The Turks are certainly to blame for this—it was a very favourable moment for them; they might by exerting greater intelligence have crushed a large part of the Russian forces, while now the Russians have conquered the Turkish position at Ardahan. After this, it is quite plain that, if success, the Russians have advanced towards Olli, from which side they now menace Erzerum.

Mukhtar Pasha a few days ago lost nearly 4000 men of Circassian cavalry who were massacred by the Russians at Bekli Ahmed where they had rested for the night on their way to Kars. The Turkish cavalry was completely unsupported by infantry or artillery, and the Russians, informed by spies of the defenceless condition of this troop, attacked them. The combat was furious and only 200 Circassians remained of 4000. The only success of the Turks was to capture the Russian conquest of a small Russian place, Suchuk Kale, on the shore of the Black Sea, in Cagascia. At Constantinople it was hoped, that after this slight victory the Circassians of the neighbouring provinces would rise and support the Turkish army; but, even if this hope should be realised, it would still create no favourable chances for the Turks, as their army is in want of good officers, good provisions, and the necessary munitions.

JUNE 7.

Emperor Alexander has joined his army, and he arrived in Roumania on the 8th of June. He went immediately to Ibraia, where he will be received by the Prince Charles of Roumania. The Czar is accompanied by the Grand Duke hereditary, several other grand dukes, and Prince Gortschakoff. It is, of course, anticipated that the movements on the Danube will now begin at once, if the state of the stream allows the passage.

As the events in the Orient are progressing slowly, the general attention and discussion has again turned towards the diplomatic action and particularly towards the "pourparlers" between Russia and England regarding the line of demarcation. The communications which the English and French Press gave in this direction have proved perfectly valueless since the declaration has been given in the House of Commons that the Cabinet of St. James's knew nothing of proposals on the part of Russia to localise the war. As no proposals to this end had been given, England had been in a position to refuse them. England had, therefore, her hands free; and the Russian proposals, even if they may adopt, cannot rely upon a friendly reception in London. Journals in Paris even went so far as to spread rumours, according to which, "pourparlers" regarding a speedy end of the war were going on—speaking even of the possibility of peace being made before even the Danube is crossed. At first these rumours rose in the vague form that the German Chancellor, in the month of May, after the events in France, intended to take advantage of the great success of Russia to abandon the restrictive attitude until then observed by Germany, in order to offer her mediations for bringing on peace. After this the "on dits" took a more positive form, and stated that the fall of Ardahan, and the retreat of the Turks on Erzerum, together with the impression made on the Sultan and his counsellors by the meeting of the members of the Chamber, and of the population of the country, had already furnished the desired opportunity.

It is likewise mentioned, as being of importance, that Edhem Pasha, the present Grand-Vizier, was for some time Ambassador in Berlin, and that since his return home he had constantly been keeping up very intimate relations with the Berlin Cabinet through his intimate friend, the present "Chargé d'Affaires" here. It is not worth while to criticise or to conduct these rumours. Germany is not in a position to keep up the alliance between the Empires, and it is rumoured about new alliances must be regarded as conjectural combinations. The war forms indeed the subject of many serious

Constitution, and thereby most likely also many of the present institutions in France. Troublous in the whole country would begin again, and the country would again be plunged into uncertainty. The Republic would be much endangered, and their only force would perhaps arise from the jealousy and disunion of the different monarchical parties. The new French Cabinet have spent the first two weeks of their existence to make arrangements amongst the officials, so as to be prepared for the dissolution of the Chamber, and for the appeal to the nation. Many of the old projects have been dismissed, now ones have been nominated and the best steps have been taken for being able to suppress any signs of opposition immediately by force. Nevertheless, the new Cabinet seems not to feel secure or safe. They are afraid that their reign will only be of short duration. They find themselves in the necessity to call again together the Chamber in the middle of this month, in order to begin the counsel about the Budget. Then of course an interpellation about this last coup d'état will come, and the Cabinet after a great defeat will have no other choice than to dissolve the Chamber and issue a proclamation for new elections. These latter the Ministers must not expect any favourable results. Thus the new Cabinet have very few chances, and with the end of the present Cabinet will be decided the important question whether the present Constitution and the present President are to be kept.

The strong resistance which the Cabinet Broglie find in the whole country gives rise to the fear that the Cabinet might take the resolution to unburden themselves of their inner embarrasements by building up complications with their neighbours abroad. The many assurances of the Marshals, MacMahon and the Duke Decazes, that France will for the future follow a peaceful policy, and that her relations to the other powers are of the very best, are to themselves no guarantee; and how little significance the German Government accord to them is proved by the fact that in the consultations of the members of the Government regarding the last Cabinet crisis a decided warning for precaution against France has been pronounced. This precaution is, I think, only too much necessary and justified, as the Republican parties in France have too, on every opportunity, manifested open enmity against the Government. The Emperor and the French had really wished a reconciliation with Germany, they would not have had to undergo such experiences as they are making now, and they would not meet with mistrust from the neighbours. A general mistrust must take place if the principal motive of the conspiracy of the clerical party in France, Spain, Rome, and Vienna is to be found in the plan that they want to see Don Carlos of Spain, the hero of the Civil war, raised to the legislative throne of France.

The whole English Press is indeed most violently and unanimously blaming and condemning the Emperor and his Ministers, and the French politicians, as such acts can only bring on serious conflicts and complications in the country and abroad.

Public opinion in Italy is likewise greatly excited by the Cabinet crisis in France, and several members of the Left have requested in the Chamber an explanation of their Government regarding their relations with the French Cabinet. The answers of the different Ministers have been thoroughly quitting for the Government, who by the rise of the clerical Cabinet in France would still be unopposed, but must keep up friendly relations with France as long as there exists no direct reason for complaints. Nevertheless the Italian public is full of mistrust and general fears.

There is nothing now to recount of social life. The aristocracy have gone to the country seats, the Emperor is for the moment at Rabelsky, whence he will go to drink the waters at Ems, and later take, as every year, the baths at Gastein. Empress Augusta is at Coblenz. The Crown Prince and his family are in Potsdam. Prince Charles has returned from his journey in Tunis and is now bathing at Wiesbaden.

The theatres have ended their season. The Royal stages begin their holidays in two weeks. The minor theatres close for two months, as the weather is too warm to make it bearable in a lit-up and crowded house. The garden concerts have begun in the Zoological, the Horticultural, &c., and thousands of persons are to be found there every afternoon.

Business is as slow as it can be, the Cabinet crisis in France having in a great measure made things worse. The commercial world than they were before. The result of this crisis are most feared, and a great deal of our money is sent to London for safety. There is no saying what will happen. I do not wish to prophesy badly, but I am afraid that we stand very near before a new war between France and Germany. For the welfare of both countries I should wish to be mistaken, but the constellation of the political horizon looks very dark.

THE VATICAN EXHIBITION.

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT AT ROME.]

THE vast and superbly appointed galleries which lead from the Hall of St. Andrew to the Raffaella rooms are those which have been selected for the Vatican Exhibition. They are known as the Tapestry and Geographic Galleries, the latter so named from the ancient maps of Italy, painted in fresco on the wall on such a large scale that fleets of galleys are represented sailing about—some entering the harbours, some in mid-sea. On the rooves of the screens sit those sea maidens becoming to Ulysses and his sailors. The mountain woods and smaller towns that surround Italy are represented with their names printed in legible characters. For the present the side of this gallery opposite the windows is completely covered with the many-coloured and richly embroidered church vestments, which have been presented to the Pope by the pilgrims of all nations, and which form the principal show of this exhibition. The entrance is through a door to the left as you pass under the arches leading towards the Vatican. The Swiss guards remind us that we are entering the non-circumscribed Pontifical domain. Up several long flights of stairs and through doors guarded by the Pope's palatine guards in red trousers and dark blue jackets you enter at last the Exhibition. I was there last Saturday, when it looked particularly gay for the crowds of dark-robed pilgrims and well-dressed city visitors were varied by eight or ten violet cardinals, and dozens of pink and red ones.
